

Entrance to the National Cemetery. Here sleep more than 15,000 Union soldiers who perished in fruitless attacks upon Marye's Heights.

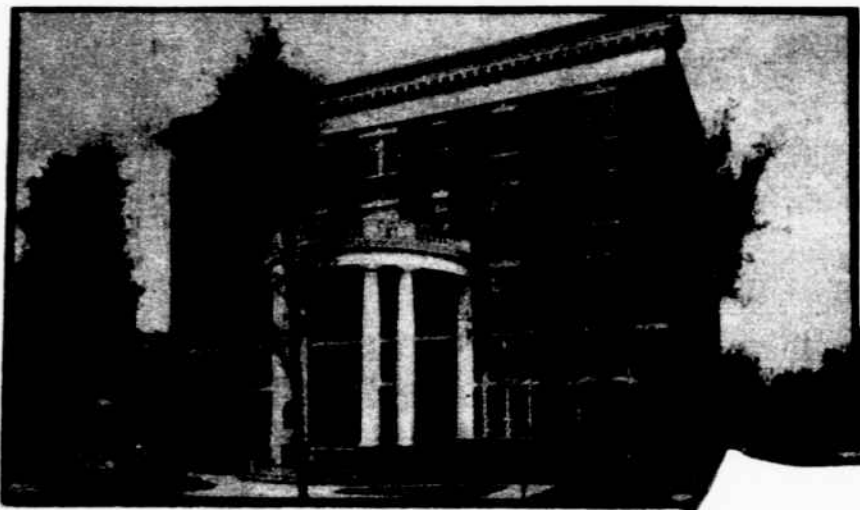

FAMOUS FREDERICKSBURG VA

Fredericksburg High School.

The fine group of the State Normal School, its Colonial facades following the traditions of Fredericksburg architecture.

Princess Anne Hotel.

"Kenmore," built in 1740. It was to this mansion that Col. Fielding Lewis took Bettie Washington---George's sister---as a bride.

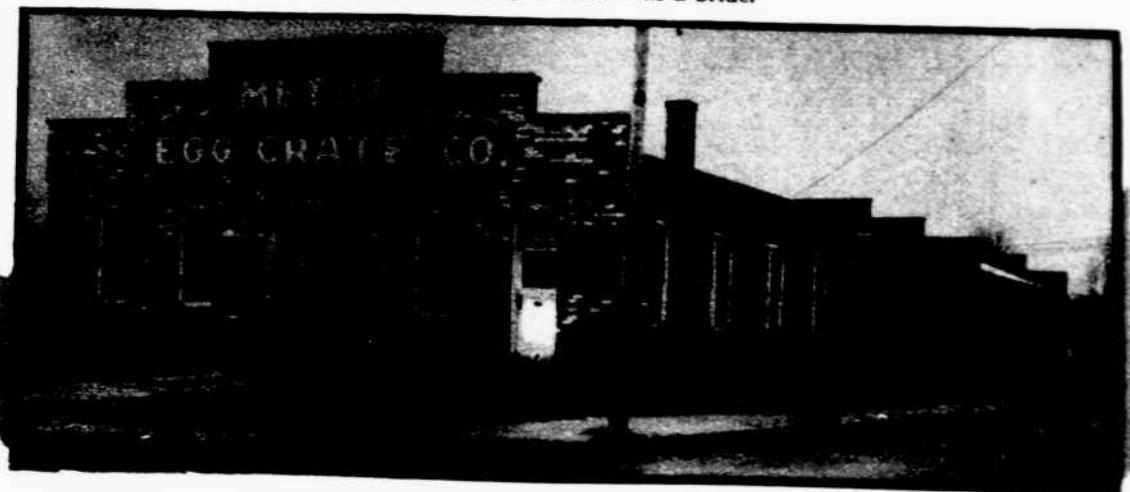

Masonic lodge in which George Washington received his first degree, Nov. 4, 1752.

HOME land of presidents and scene of struggles in the Revolution and Civil War, Fredericksburg, Va., has more to recommend it than historic interest.

It is strategically situated midway between Washington and Richmond, on a trunk line railroad and the Bankhead Highway. As a commercial and manufacturing center, the city offers a fine field for immediate development. The rapids of the Rappahannock are waiting to be harnessed for an output of thousands upon thousands of hydroelectric horsepower.

Fredericksburg enjoys an unsurpassed climate, which is but one of its distinct residential advantages. Its schools and libraries, too, are models. Best of all, Fredericksburg possesses a very much alive and ambitious Chamber of Commerce.

Modern plant of the Metal Egg Crate Company, one of the busiest manufactories of the town.

It was in this humble story-and-a-half dwelling that the mother of the First President lived from 1772 until her death in 1789.

Brompton. From the summit about this house, Confederates poured a murderous fire into attacking Federal troops, Dec. 13, 1862.
